This past Wednesday eveing, the cocktail party in honor of the National Audubon Society■,s Living Ocean, held at the home of W. Graham Arader III at 1016 Madison Avenue, was a stellar event, drawing a crowd and raising awareness. The focus of the event was the launching of the ■&Just Ask■8 campaign, aimed at protecting the creatures of the sea by expanding consumer awareness about food from the ocean. Attendees sampled delicious recipes from some of the top US chefs, all of whom used fish recommended by the ■&Seafood Lover■,s Almanac,■8 a beautifully designed, whimsical guide to fish and shellfish that serves to help consumers become more familiar with the seafood they eat.
Edited by Ms. Mercedes Lee (with Suzanne Iudicello and Dr. Safina contributing), the Seafood Lover■,s Almanac provides readers with crucial information regarding sea life: what is safe to eat, for example, and which species are endangered. Many seafoods commonly available today are much less plentiful than the average consumer might think. Consumers hold the greatest influence over the buying decisions of seafood wholesalers and retailers, and with the efforts of the National Audubon Society this issue will have a much greater chance of receiving widespread attention.

America■,s top seafood chefs (and their spectacular creations) were in attendance, including Rick Moonen, of Oceana, New York; Todd English, Kingfish Hall, Boston; Jonathan Eismann, Pacific Time, Miami; Robert Kinkead, Kinkead■,s, Washington, D.C.; and Terence Feury, Striped Bass, Philadelphia. The sampling of food ranged from Margarita Oysters to Dungeness Crabcakes with Chipotle Vinaigrette, Sesame Seared Tuna with seaweed salad, pickled ginger, wasabe and fried wontons, all served up in an irresistible fashion. Best of all, the chefs generously shared their recipes to all who whished to recreate these delicious appetizers at home.

Other notable guests included Jennifer Bogo, Associate Editor for The
